Housing was the top concern, one of the top concerns, the 3rd top concern of siblings in that survey. And I'm sure you can imagine why. In the 2016 statistics Canada census, about 35% of young people. So that would be 20 to 32, were living with their parents. But in our survey that we did, we found that 63% of brothers and sisters with a disability we're living with our parents. And that rate didn't change a lot as they got older. So if people are living, people with disabilities are living with their parents for longer and then the parents are passing away, that launches a whole crisis when the parents pass away and it's the brother and sister who may be stepping into a caregiving role that needs to navigate that crisis, which is exactly what happened to me.

So we launched another survey in 2021. And the concern for housing has not changed. But what we found that was very interesting is that in that survey, 20% of people responded that they were living with their sibling with a disability. And 41% anticipated that they would be living with them in the future. So that kind of leads to a whole bunch of questions like why are people making that decision? Is it because of the housing crisis that there's no other options available? That their parents haven't done planning? You know, we don't know why so many people are anticipating living with her brother and sister. I mean, I don't think we see that, such a high number in, when there's not a disability included. But I think that's a really good place to start asking a lot of questions on why siblings are doing that.
