

Clip 8 Transcript

Helen: So Siblings Canada tends to, I call it cream siblings. So we attract siblings who are interested in the long term well-being of their brothers and sisters. That's our mission. That if me as a sibling, if I'm strong and resilience, I have resources that I can access, then I can care for my brother and sister as well-being over the long term. So those are the siblings that we attract. We have been noticing. Siblings coming to Siblings Canada where their culture, their community, in those cultures and communities, it's not a choice. So, you are going to look after your brother and sister. That's a very different circumstance than when somebody decides they're going to look after their brother and sister. So you might see those kind of variations across communities. There's also, we haven't done a lot of work yet, or been in a lot of contact yet with indigenous communities and northern communities. So the Canadian Center for Care Giving Excellence does have strong connections in the north and in indigenous communities across Canada so hopefully there's some kind of work or support we can do with those communities at some point. I just think I don't have a direct answer for that question. I just think that you're going to find variation in communities all across Canada. Based on culture, culture of origin of the people but also a culture of that province or community such as what I referenced earlier, you know.